Apple is setting itself up for a giant iPad

Some of the most interesting features Apple unveiled this week for its iOS 9 operating system were new controls specifically designed for the iPad. These included: A new split-screen mode to quickly open a second app in the right column and then slide it away. For example, you could quickly slide the Twitter app into view while you're reading a website. A second, more powerful split-screen mode to fully use two apps at a time, side-by-side. For example, you could simultaneously browse a map while making a to-do list for the day. A picture-in-picture mode that lets a video float over the rest of what you're doing on the iPad, with adjustable size and positioning. A new set of keyboard features. These include the ability to swipe over the keyboard with two fingers to simulate a trackpad, which is designed to simplify moving around a document and selecting text. iPad split view and picture-in-picture. (Apple) These additions will work fine on today's current iPad lineup—the iPad Air, with a 9.7-inch screen, and the iPad mini, with a 7.9-inch screen. But if you read between the lines, it's easy to see Apple is thinking bigger, in the literal sense. Some of these changes only really become great on a big screen.

Save space on your iPhone by removing unwanted albums and tracks

While it's great to have every album you own always in your pocket, over time this can present storage issues - especially if you sport an 8GB iPhone. Thankfully this isn't as much of an issue as you might think. ...

First Apple Smart Home Products Launch Ahead of Worldwide Developer Conference

The first products to take advantage of Apple's smart home technology were unveiled today, just days before the start of the company's Worldwide Developer Conference. Five device-makers announced products that dim the lights or adjust room temperature with a spoken command or control fans and other home appliances from the iPhone, iPad or iPod touch. Two products are available now, with others reaching stores in the coming weeks. Apple announced its entry into home automation a year ago with the introduction of its HomeKit software. At the time, the Cupertino technology company announced several partners, including Philips, Honeywell, August and Schlage. But this new generation of connected gadgets has been slow to reach consumers. iHome, a maker of a iPhone- and iPod-compatible clock radios and audio accessories, said its first HomeKit product would begin reaching stores in late June. Its SmartPlug allows consumers to use Siri to control their lighting, fans and other home devices. Luton Electronics' Caséta Wireless Lighting Starter Kit provides wireless plugs, remote control dimmer switches and a smart bridge, which allows homeowners to adjust their lights (and, in some cases, the window shades and thermostats) without leaving their couches. Its software will even send a notification if the homeowner has left without turning off the lights. It is available now. ...

Tip of the Day: iOS Apps in Landscape Mode on iPhone 6 Plus

More than just the Messages app has a special horizontal layout on the iPhone 6 Plus. Like the iPad, the phablet-sized iPhone 6 Plus offers special horizontal layouts to users in the Mail, Messages, Notes, Stocks, Reminders, Clock, Contacts, and Voice Memos apps and on the Home Screen. Here are some of the cool things you can do with your iPhone 6 Plus in landscape mode. (Please note: landscape mode features won't work if you have Display Zoom enabled or if your display is locked in portrait orientation.) Split Screen Mail, Messages, Calendar, Stocks, Reminders, Contacts, and Voice Memos all have split-screen views when you hold your iPhone 6 Plus in landscape orientation, allowing you to see two levels of information at once. You can expand your composition box in Mail and Notes by tapping on the two arrows in the top center. World Clock The horizontal view of the Clock app shows the world clock with the current time and weather in all your saved cities. When you turn your phone to landscape mode while composing in Notes, Mail, or Messages, more keys appear on the keyboard and others move to the side, away from their original places. This gives you more room to type (especially if you're mobile and have "fat fingers" that make it hard to use your iPhone screen as a note-taking machine. Home Screen
